Hot and dry weather is expected across the state of Idaho for the next several days with high temperatures ranging from the mid-90s to around 100 in lower valley locations later this week. There could be new daily record high temperatures set at a few locations in southern Idaho on Friday and Saturday. No precipitation is expected during this time, and winds will be light with no significant impacts expected to outdoor COVID-19 operations. The long-range outlook issued by the NWS Climate Prediction Center for 8 to 14 days into the future shows warmer and drier than normal conditions are likely to continue into mid-September.
